

Reclaiming Existence: Trauma and Resilience in the Select Works of Edwidge Danticat

By

Pearline Priscilla D.

16PHENF001

Supervisor

Dr. S. Christina Rebecca

A Thesis Submitted to

Avinashilingam Institute for Home Science and Higher Education for Women, Coimbatore – 641 043

In partial fulfilment of the requirements for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy in English

November 2020

80_Recommendation

The research has dealt with the ways in which the Haitians accept their past and the process they adapt to become resilient. More research on the unexplored branches of trauma relating to social, political, cultural and institutional betrayal trauma can be challenged. Feminist perspectives combined with eco-criticism can give a new dimension in the field of Caribbean/Haitian studies. Kitchen histories with cooking as a major cultural aspect can be probed with new literary insights. In this era of mass migrations, the difficulties they face in numerous countries can be analyzed with respect to various governments and their laws. Considering the positive use of technology and the Haitian involvement in implementing it to help spread their extinct languages can be taken up as a new research framework. Research based on gender, race, ethnicity and colour related disparities can be insightful towards developing a comprehensible society. Post-structural and post-modern research involving multi-disciplinary approaches can prove both interesting and challenging. Interlinking theories and criticism on memory, testimony, history and trauma might promote profundity into the field of research. Religious studies based on voodoo culture and theology can also be attempted. These are the few scopes for further research which can be taken up as a challenge based on the works from Caribbean/Haitian literature and on Edwidge Danticat.